NEEDED ELSEWHERE!

In 2001, when China celebrated Beijing's successful candidacy for the 2008 Olympic Games, Ni Yulan worked as a business lawyer for a large commercial corporation. The celebratory songs in the streets of the capital city had barely died out before they were replaced by the sound of wrecking balls. In the years that followed, she was arrested several times by the police, who beat her and tortured her to such an extent that she can no longer walk unaided. She had been jailed already twice before the making of the movie, and she was arrested again recently, in April 2011. Her own home had been demolished in the meantime. She tells her story from her wheelchair in a park by a busy road, where she sleeps in a tent with her husband. This uncompromising filmic chronicle (which undeniably looks like it wasn't shot by professional documentary-makers, but by courageous human rights activists) follows their everyday life on the street and offers surprisingly open testimony from people for whom the great Olympic dream turned into a nightmare.
